

Kenyon International Emergency Services Launches a New Aviation Emergency Response Training Website

For Immediate Release

(Houston, Texas, USA) Kenyon International Emergency Services, the world's leading disaster management company, is pleased to introduce its new Aviation Emergency Response Training website dedicated to provide comprehensive emergency response training services to the aviation industry. "Our new Aviation Emergency Response Training website gives Kenyon International a vehicle to demonstrate our training capabilities to members and perspective members", said Robert Jensen, President and CEO of Kenyon International Emergency Services. "Our web designers, in partnership with our training team, have created a new website that covers all aspects of aviation emergency response training including auditing, emergency planning and exercise services."

The Aviation Emergency Response Training website can be accessed at www.kenyoninternational.com/consultancy.

The website is designed with tabs for easy access to find training, planning and exercise drill classes. "Anyone looking at the website can easily navigate to find any course they are looking for, Jensen said. "It is the idea of using the 12 Principals of Aviation Crisis Response and organizing our classes around them. When people on the website see the courses, they will see the information and links to contact Kenyon to inquire about having a course run at their location or join a course that is running at a different location. The training website gives everyone a one-stop shopping to locate any information with a minimum amount of navigation to find what the need."
